

Excerpt from Experimental Psychology: A Manual of Laboratory Practice On the average, we can still hear a tone of so-and-so many vibrations; on the average, we can distinguish two weights if they differ by such-and-such an amount. The question which the quantitative experiment answers is, therefore, some variant of the question How much? Notice, however, that this is not the question asked of consciousness. That question is always the one or other of the two just mentioned: Present or absent? and Same or different? Here, then, is a second difference between the qualitative and the quantitative experiment. The former, aiming at description, comes to an end when introspection has made its report; the latter, aiming at measurement, subjects the results of introspection to mathematical treatment. The experiments are complementary, each sacrificing something and each gaining something. The qualitative experiment shows us all the detail and variety of the mental life, and in so doing forbids us to pack its results into formulas; the quantitative experiment furnishes us with certain uniformities of the mental life, neatly and summarily expressed, but for that very reason must pass unnoticed many things that a qualitatively directed introspection would bring to light. The Quantitative Experiment in Practice. - In general, the rules for the conduct of a quantitative experiment are the same as those for a qualitative experiment (vol. I., xiii. f.). There are, however, in practice, certain well-marked differences between the two types of experiment. (1) In the first place, the quantitative experiment demands much more outside preparatory work than does the qualitative. Most, if not all, of the reading done in preparation for the experiments of vol. I. could be done within the laboratory. This is not the case with the experiments that you are now to perform. The quantitative experiment sums up, in a single representative value, the results of a large number of observations. It is clear, then, that the conditions of observation must be the same throughout: otherwise the results will not be comparable.
